Lymph node micrometastases are associated with failure of adjuvant therapy in patients with gastric cancer. Adjuvant chemotherapy has an established role in the treatment of gastric cancer, but evidence suggests that this may be limited to the D2 dissection as shown by the fact that recurrence in the D3 (perigastric) and D4 (D-part of the pancreas) lymph nodes remains problematic. The aim of this study was to elucidate the possible importance of micrometastatic tumor cells (MTCs) in lymph nodes in patients who have received curative, D2 gastrectomy for gastric cancer. Fresh lymph node tissue was collected from lymph nodes with MTCs from 23 patients who had D2 gastrectomy for gastric cancer and from 19 patients who had D3 or D4 gastrectomy for gastric cancer. Paraffin-embedded tissue sections from nodes with MTCs were analyzed for MTCs and compared with those of lymph nodes without MTCs from patients of the same group of patients, and from patients with lymph nodes examined by careful macroscopic examination who did not have MTCs. By the use of cytokeratin-based immunohistochemistry, tumor cells were evaluated for cytoplasmic expression of TTF1, CEA, CK7, CK18, and CK19. Malignant cells were also assessed by silver staining. Of the nodal specimens from patients with known MTCs, 22% were positive for 1 MTC, and 8% were positive for 2 MTCs. Twenty-five percent of lymph nodes with no apparent metastatic spread were positive for MTCs. MTCs were detected in 10% of the slides examined from lymph nodes with no macroscopic evidence of metastases. Statistical analysis of
