Tooth extraction and solid organ transplantation are potential sources of infection requiring hospitalization. Care of these patients includes routine vaccination against influenza and Streptococcus pneumoniae, dental prophylaxis, and appropriate antibiotic and immunosuppression therapy for the dental and bacterial pathogens. Management of the immunocompromised patient from the dental perspective should be similar to the management of the immunocompetent patient. On occasions, special considerations and adaptations may be necessary, including: timely antiviral therapy to prevent or resolve an infection; treatment of concomitant bacterial infections; systemic immunosuppression regimens as adjunct therapy; attention to appropriate antibiotic therapy to prevent or manage bacterial infections; close monitoring of graft function to identify impending complications; and prevention of opportunistic infections. Although no studies have examined the rates of periodontitis in these patients, periodontal disease is often seen in the general population of this age group and may be expected to be a similar problem for immunocompromised patients. In fact, aggressive oral hygiene regimens and routine dental prophylaxis (every 1-2 weeks) may be indicated for this population.
