The analgesic activities of four 2-aminopyridines (2-APs) were compared to those of the established NSAID, dipyrone, in an established neuropathic pain model in rats. In the rat masseter muscle ischemia-reperfusion model, at an oral dose of 50 mg/kg, dipyrone (30 mg/kg) was slightly more effective than 2-AP in inhibiting mechanical allodynia and the spontaneous guarding behaviors induced by the model. In the paw-incision model, the 2-APs were more effective than dipyrone in inhibiting mechanical allodynia and spontaneous guarding. In the streptozotocin-induced diabetes model, all 2-APs (3-30 mg/kg, oral) produced a dose-dependent, significant analgesic effect against thermal hyperalgesia. Among the 4 2-APs tested, the compound exhibiting the highest oral efficacy (3 mg/kg) also showed the highest oral efficacy in the ischemia-reperfusion model. In contrast, 1,2-dimethyl-3-aminopyridine did not produce any significant effect in the masseter muscle ischemia-reperfusion model. The results indicate that the 2-APs are more effective analgesics than dipyrone in the treatment of neuropathic pain.
