Australia's population has declined for the fifth year in a row, with a heavy dose of deaths linked to the coronavirus putting pressure on an already stretched system of public hospitals, health workers and facilities. The national death toll from Covid-19 topped 4,200 on Friday, with the government predicting that figure will rise to more than 6,000 by the end of June, with hundreds of thousands of Australians placed under quarantine. A record 629 more deaths were recorded in Australia last week, bringing the national toll to almost 6,500, although the data was not broken down by state as it previously had been. A new chief health officer Peter Dutton said Australia was confronting the "worst of the worst" with the coronavirus pandemic and the country should prepare for a further spike in deaths if mitigation measures are relaxed before the end of the year. "We're facing the worst of the worst in terms of the impact of Covid-19," said Dutton, who was appointed on Wednesday by Scott Morrison, the prime minister, and had previously been Australia's immigration minister. Dutton took over the role of chief health officer at the same time as the prime minister named him as the nation's government chief to coordinate the response. The government has called on a range of industries to provide more ventilators, test kits and personal protective equipment (PPE) to help support the effort to tackle the pandemic, including social distancing measures. But experts have warned the public will need to continue to accept lockdown measures in order to minimise the risk of a second wave of infections and the associated death toll. Responding to the latest death toll figures, Dr Michael Gardener, Australia's chief medical officer, said the nation had the resources and flexibility to take a measured approach to the pandemic. "The current course of action has been working and it remains working," he told reporters. But he urged the government to re-open schools and allow the medical system to operate freely. "The risk is very real that if we relax our current measures, the risk of another wave of transmission and the result of another spike in our epidemic is imminent," he said. ♦ 1cb139a0ed
