Microsoft OneDrive for Business, Microsoft Teams, Microsoft Flow and Office 365 users.The significance of histology and clinical stage of primary breast carcinoma and axillary lymph node metastases in predicting outcome in patients treated with adjuvant chemotherapy. The value of histological type and clinical stage of primary breast carcinoma and axillary lymph node metastases in predicting the outcome of patients treated with adjuvant chemotherapy has been evaluated in a retrospective analysis of 300 patients, all of whom had adjuvant treatment consisting of cyclophosphamide, methotrexate and fluorouracil (CMF). The factors histological type (ductal, lobular, undifferentiated, mucinous) and clinical stage were assessed against local and metastatic recurrences and survival. Histological type and stage were statistically significant (p less than 0.005) in predicting local and metastatic recurrence. Ductal histological type was associated with fewer local recurrences (26 of 141) than lobular (57 of 93) or undifferentiated (6 of 21) types. Ductal (44 of 91) and lobular (68 of 80) histological types were associated with fewer metastatic recurrences than undifferentiated types (6 of 21). There were fewer deaths in the whole group of patients with ductal (3 of 141) than lobular (20 of 93) or undifferentiated (8 of 21) types. However, the reduction in survival was not statistically significant. The same trend was seen for stage (p less than 0.0001) but the difference between T1 and T2 was not significant. However, in the subgroup of patients with T2 tumours, the survival of stage II patients was significantly better than stage III patients (p less than 0.0001). In patients
