Advertising on Gold: Let's make Pakistan cashless in next 5 years When it comes to cash and banking, Pakistanis have a high exchange rate of the rupee-dollar. Individuals, businesses and government bodies have to pay close to the same dollar value as they are holding on their accounts. A high exchange rate is inconvenient, especially for governments and those of underprivileged people. For which, there is a solution: to make payments by cryptocurrency. The crypto market has seen tremendous growth in 2017; more than $4 billion in total trading volume was recorded in November 2017 alone, according to tracking website Coinmarketcap.com. This article discusses how crypto might work for the entire Pakistani nation, and how it could be an effective solution to the problem. Advertisement: Why it makes sense Exchange rates are the most important ratio in the world because they directly impact your income. The cost of goods and services you buy and sell is often determined by the values of money. So, decreasing the exchange rate is a great opportunity for every business. Instead of having to pay the higher rate, businesses will be able to pay with less and give people more value. The existing payment solution One of the biggest challenges with paying digitally is that the majority of Pakistani businesses use cash to pay for goods and services. This is not only an inconvenience for customers because it means being a cash-based society, but it is also inconvenient for businesses because they have to pay high exchange rates to receive or send money to customers. With the cashless trend, Pakistanis will have a more convenient way of receiving digital value for goods and services. Crypto can provide a cheaper alternative for payments for a wide range of products and services, including e-commerce and brick-and-mortar business. Cashlessness is a perfect solution for businesses and government departments. The credit card industry Credit card penetration in the Pakistani market is low, with only 13.3 per cent of adults having one or more credit cards. In 2015, the average cash withdrawal limit per card was Rs. 20,645, while the average annual balance was Rs. 3,333,000. This shows that despite credit cards being available, people do not use them to the extent that they should. The high withdrawal limits mean that the majority of people do not have the capability to pay for everything they would like to purchase. For example, food items, dry cleaning, cell
