Foam: what healthcare professionals know about the technology. The aim of this study was to determine how healthcare professionals in Wales learn about the latest foam technology in healthcare. In-depth semi-structured interviews were conducted with leaders and practitioners who had been responsible for implementing, or were engaged in projects that used foams. Interviews were conducted in an observation room in the clinic. A thematic framework was used to analyse the data. Interviews were conducted until saturation of themes was reached. A total of 19 healthcare professionals and managers were interviewed. Most had fewer than five years' experience of using foams. Participants had used foams in different contexts, including wound care, pressure ulcers, and wound management. Often it was at least three years since they had last used foams. Participants were familiar with education about foams and with the products themselves, but they lacked experience with how to use foams. This was in part due to the educational component of foams being weak, and in part due to the discontinuity of use. Low levels of clinical practice indicated the need for more effective education of healthcare professionals. Training was found to be limited to foam product handover in many cases. Healthcare professionals may want to be more actively involved in the training and education of foams in clinical practice. The need for more clinical practice with foams is highlighted.
