By adding UltraVNC functionality, you can share your computer screen with other NeoRouter clients connected to the same server.
It can also be used to control

It's not possible to exclude any of them from the initial installation, but you can access the add-ons manager of NeoRouter afterward if you're interested in disabling either the server or client component. The server has to be installed on the computer that will provide remote access to other users, while the client must exist on the workstation that will be granted access and control. NeoRouter has to be restarted after the UltraVNC integration, in order to apply the modifications. Configure admin settings for the UltraVNC server The configuration panel of the UltraVNC add-on is displayed at startup automatically, so you can configure server-side admin properties. For example, you can pick the number of ports to use, disable the Java viewer (HTTP connections), allow loopback connections, and set a VNC password necessary for authentication. File transfers can be enabled. Moreover, the tool can lock the computer or log off the user when the last client disconnects. The add-on shows an icon in the taskbar notifications area while the UltraVNC server is running. You can right-click this icon to change admin properties again, add new clients by host name and ID code, terminate all clients, or close all VNC connections. Remotely access computers and transfer files in NeoRouter We haven't had any trouble with integrating the UltraVNC add-on into NeoRouter in our tests. However, the desktop connections were not powerful enough, even when two computers were in the same local network, since the remote PC responded to commands slowly.
