This is a very, very general question. Nevertheless, I am wondering what particular dangers of civilization have we managed to face? There are many myths and folk tales about monsters and yuckies that would do us in. But are there real, legitimate dangers of civilization that we have to worry about? A: To keep the question on topic, I'll focus on the dangers of civilization as they are now. The biggest risk at the moment is climate change and I think it is safe to say that there isn't an antidote to that. The warning signs that things are about to go wrong include an increase in droughts, an increase in storms and a decrease in the amount of food that we harvest. These are signs of a coming climate disaster that most people have not even heard of. The other problem is oil depletion. This is not an issue of climate change. Many forms of energy that we use run out. The major problem is not supply, but rather supply price. Even if we found new sources of supply, it is likely that supplies won't be able to keep up with demand. When that happens, the cost of both fossil fuels and nuclear power will skyrocket. A: Of course, there are some, at least in the short term. Inflation and its corollaries, property price inflation and declining purchasing power are of course one of these, as well as the physical strain of living in a complex society. Another is the rate of innovation and creativity. Modern civilization in the past 10,000 years has been leading to a steady acceleration of technological development. This means that we enjoy more and more conveniences, like air conditioning. But we also struggle with new problems like nuclear proliferation, and of course the problem of pollution. Finally, we have the problem of complexity, both in the sense of increasing social complexity as we develop societies like ours with a variety of sub-societies, and more abstract complexity. So we need a lot of data, be it for scientific research, or for political strategy, or for the process of running of society. Unfortunately, the easy to acquire and store data appears to be growing less. Q: How 1cb139a0ed
