We randomized 13 women with peritonitis-related sepsis to receive oral iron supplementation or no supplementation during intravenous antibiotics. Iron-supplemented patients received intravenous iron and oral multivitamins. Control patients received intravenous antibiotics alone. Iron levels rose more quickly in the supplemented group, but returned to normal by the end of the study. This difference in iron levels persisted throughout the antibiotic treatment period (p = 0.001), and continued through the 1 week posttreatment interval. Patients in the supplemented group had significantly better iron status as determined by hemoglobin and hematocrit levels and transferrin saturation, as well as higher albumin levels. However, only hemoglobin and hematocrit levels approached statistical significance in this group (p = 0.057 and 0.057 respectively). There was no difference between groups in length of intravenous antibiotic treatment. In a similar group of patients who had undergone regular hemodialysis, iron levels remained normal with the use of iron supplementation, with a long-term view. We also seek a collaborative approach, having successfully worked with individuals and groups from whom we can recruit participants. By achieving all three goals we hope to inform other researchers planning similar intervention studies. Additional files (#Sec12) ===== Additional file 1:Case study questionnaire.
