I was able to attend the sprint with the intention of learning more about the migration away from traditional Unix-based servers and moving towards a more web-based system. During this weekend of workshops, I was able to continue to explore PHP and the workings of an API. As an API (application program interface) is a way to access the database or server from an application (via a web service), APIs are being used more and more these days on the internet. One of the sites that inspired me to explore APIs was the WikiOpenAPI.org. This wiki is part of the OpenAPI Initiative and was started to allow the community to collaborate and build upon the knowledge contained within. In fact, the WP5 roadmap (makes mention of developing and implementing an API for WordPress, which I'm quite interested in. If you want to gain a better understanding of how APIs work, the WikiOpenAPI.org has a series of articles that walk you through a series of steps of creating an API that you can use yourself. The series of articles provided by WikiOpenAPI.org is extremely in-depth. I highly recommend that you check them out. Another site that I found while exploring APIs was the PHP-Artwork API. This API was designed by 3c33713323
