There are two types of cells that form the nucleus pulposus. The superior glial cells have an even morphology, whereas the inferior glial cells have an uneven morphology. Eumorphism is the unevenness in cell morphology. The inferior glial cells in the nucleus pulposus are more eumorphic in cells with a round morphology whereas the superior glial cells are more eumorphic in cells with a spindle morphology. The differentiation in cell morphology from round to spindle is a step in maturation of the chondrocytes. In this study, the inferior glial cells in the nucleus pulposus became more spindle shaped and the superior glial cells more round. The superior glial cells in the nucleus pulposus are not known to synthesize proteoglycan, but the inferior glial cells synthesize and secrete more proteoglycan than any other cell types in the nucleus pulposus. In this study, the superior glial cells in the nucleus pulposus had more nucleus than the ca3bfb1094
