The retinoblastoma tumor suppressor gene is inactivated in a subset of human cancers by either abnormal DNA methylation or homozygous deletion. A recurrent translocation involving chromosome 13 has been noted in leukemia that has been associated with a retinoblastoma phenotype in which the retinoblastoma gene is fused to ETS-1 transcription factor. In this report, the use of fluorescence in situ hybridization (FISH) was used to investigate whether the translocation involving chromosome 13 occurs at the retinoblastoma gene locus. The results demonstrated that the retinoblastoma gene was deleted in 20% of patients tested and that a translocation involving the retinoblastoma gene locus was present in a subset of children with acute leukemia. This result demonstrates a molecular basis for a subset of the retinoblastoma syndrome, involving the loss of one copy of the retinoblastoma gene. In many processing systems, considerable time and resources are devoted to controlling the memory access functions of a memory system. Memory access generally involves the addressing of an address location in memory, the availability of data stored at the addressed memory location, and the transfer of data from the addressed location to a processing unit. A processor must in turn execute a series of micro-programmed instructions, each of which addresses a memory location. Typically, it takes time to access a memory location. This time is consumed by physically moving the memory to the addressed location and, depending upon the distance of the memory location from the processor, it may take time to move the data from the memory location to the processor. The time spent moving data to and from memory or within
