How best to measure the impact of new technologies and build efficiencies into your operations is key. That will be the focus of our February webinar. Our topic for March will be the "digitization of the part of supply chain that deals with the raw materials that go into making the product — the part that is often referred to as the aftermarket." Over the course of our webinar, we will look at various technologies — including 3-D scanning and predictive design — that are helping to move production to near final location and eliminate parts from the supply chain altogether by utilizing them on a one-to-one basis. The advancement of the digitization of supply chains into customers' space is a key tenet of the 4th Industrial Revolution. As supply chain assets move closer to customers and service centers, they become more visible and accessible. But the challenge for a company, and every company that seeks to leverage a supply chain, is to leverage these resources efficiently in ways that are easy to digest, and have a direct, measurable impact. While most organizations remain focused on reducing total supply chain costs, the four G's must be the main drivers of supply chain efficiency and efficiencies need to be continuously strengthened for optimal success. Wearable medical sensors are being increasingly used for non-invasive measurement of physiological parameters. In this paper, we propose a novel, thin-film magnetic (TFM) sensor that can be applied on or wrapped around a curved surface in close proximity to the skin. The sensor is integrated with an electronic interface, which can wirelessly transmit the measured data in real-time to a mobile device for visualization and analysis. The TFM sensor was fabricated using a continuous flow screen-printing technique and consists of a 6 mm long and 400  $\mu\text{m}$  wide TFM sensor chip that has been integrated with a flexible electronic board. The electrical characterization of the sensors using a two-wire measurement system shows that the sensor can detect external magnetic fields with high sensitivity of 7-11  $\mu\text{T/m}$ , and can detect the presence of a TFM. The sensor was further tested by measuring the human cardiac activity of a participant, revealing clear heartbeats as well as regular breathing movements. The results obtained with the TFM sensor can be further improved by incorporating the sensor chip on a curved surface, or by packaging the sensor chip in a package that can be curved.
