I'm having a really frustrating time launching a subprocess, I want to launch a thread using subprocess.Popen(), the thread should periodically run something and return the results back to the parent. I want to do this without making the parent wait, so a thread is suggested. I have the following so far

import threading
import subprocess
def threaded_process(command):
    threads = [threading.Thread(target=command) for i in range(10)]
    for t in threads: t.start()
    def threaded_thread_subprocess(threaded_process):
        def check_result():
            p = subprocess.Popen(['echo', 'result'], stdout=subprocess.PIPE)
            result = p.communicate()
            print result
            return result
        while True:
            check_result()
            print 'here'
    thread

Observing the New Jersey Devils' Practice If you are wondering if your favorite team will reach the playoffs, the answer to that question depends, at least in part, on how the games unfold over the next few weeks. Just as you can't predict a stock market, you can't predict where a team stands in the NHL, and yet, this is what hockey is all about. For the hockey-impaired, this is the speed of a game, the intensity of a game, the adaptability of the game, and the drama of the game. The New Jersey Devils, at 21-6-4 through Thursday, are in third place in the Eastern Conference, and they are averaging 4.33 goals a game. Historically, teams have struggled to score in the postseason, but the Devils, despite having nine defensemen, are averaging 3.1 goals a game. They have dominated with the man advantage, going 29-for-55 (53.7 percent) over the last three weeks. They have allowed just 2.55 goals per game in those three weeks, which was better than the league average. All of the numbers are skewed a bit because of the two games the Devils lost at the start of the season, but more on that later. For now, here is a breakdown of the Devils' offense by zone and time, with each number in parentheses representing the percentage of time the team spent in the area. As you can see, the Devils, like the Toronto Maple Leafs in the last game, seem to be able to adjust their game to the different strengths of opposing defenses. The Devils spent more time in the offensive zone, but the numbers are the same percentage-wise in the neutral and defensive zones. Stats courtesy of NHL.com.
