This is a game about working. But not like you work at a job. And not like how you work at the jobs you've always had. You work in a company called the Watchers. Not a company, a group. Your job is simple and ritualistic: take blood samples, record time-of-day and weather data, set up sensors in dangerous environments. But your level, and therefore your ability to survive and even thrive in the Watchers is solely dependent on how well you work, what you do to improve your skills and how quickly you can get data... that your employers might value. What you do with the data is up to you – you could sell it, use it to create new capabilities, or even merge it with your own and make your data be valued even more highly. You control the fate of your data by deciding what to do with it. The World and the Plot Lifeline is a post-apocalyptic thriller, set in a world where society has collapsed after a global cataclysm. The only survivors are a few fortified enclaves and a tiny number of Watchers whose job is to study and protect the natural world from the ravages of humanity. The story is set in The System, a shattered metropolis in the frozen north. The world is a cold, barren place, populated by the few remaining residents: white Northerners, Sec, domiciles who live in immense, airtight domed cities controlled by the Watchers, and the Elites, a sect of the Watchers who have dedicated their lives to creating life-prolonging medicines and researching alternative solutions to the human condition. For the factions of The System, the game's conflict is between the Elites and the Northerners. For these competing groups it is a matter of life and death, as they know any strike against The System will cause it to collapse, leaving hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions of Northerners – many of whom are the survivors of the apocalypse – to die in a massive tidal wave of snow and ice. The Northerners and the Elites each see the other as the enemy, both groups vying for power, using their differences to divide the system against itself. Lifeline's presentation uses real world weather and environmental factors to make the world look beautiful and natural, but you know that behind those beautiful and natural surfaces there's a message that is the key to understanding what happens in this world. And to play through Lifeline

What's new in Leviathan's Sword:

Star Conflict, also known as StarConflict: Roundabouts & Freighters, is an asynchronous massively multiplayer online game developed by French indie studio 4J Studios. The game is free-to-play, with in-game purchases allowing players to speed up character progression and gain additional privileges. Players engage in base capturing, building construction, trade, mining, research, weapons and warfare. It launched in May 2016 and is available for Microsoft Windows, macOS and Linux. Development The original concept and design of Star Conflict was conceived by Eugen Noronc, Julien Bélanger and Prérietre. Programming was done by Vincent Salles and Thibault Chadart-Fortino. It was released in French in April 2016. It currently has a player-base of around 700 thousand with over 60 thousand active subscribers. Purpose The game mechanics act as a prototype for implementing the following concepts into multi-player game design in the future. The first is that they are free-to-play and use not-for-profit mechanics based on the rules of snowball fighting. The second is that ships have weapons and range, and that players can dock and move their ships to other players. The game takes place in the smallest of solar systems, called the Rock And Clouds Solar System, and revolves around a human-controlled base and freighter that travels to distant mining sites. Gameplay The game consists of three kinds of ships, freighter/mining ships (known as Hot Bars), military-style freighters (known as Ice Bars), and escort ships called Comets. The Comet only causes traffic accidents but can be enslaved and used as a cannon. Comets are actually locked onto a player's base for the entire time while they are in space, and will proceed to attack the base that is closest to it. Since the base that they are originally locked onto goes to their alarm state and their saboteur (a slightly weaker base) if attacked, they can be enslaved at any time. Comets can also be found as floating wrecks near the planets with a mining system, as well as being purchased through the Exploration components of the Game Board. Combat Combat mechanics are similar to capture-the-flag, with the addition of searchlights and unique weapons and abilities. New combat mechanics and designs were brought about by involvement with the venture capital firm Cyan Worlds and presented to the task force to approve the concept. Base and

If you like the latest fright flicks or are a fan of H.P. Lovecraft (they are unrelated), then you will definitely enjoy this game. Horror House is an interesting story concept with a unique twist, that the game is all about interacting with the game objects and listening for sounds while also looking for clues to progress your adventure. You have 3 ghouls that follow simple rules to prevent you from progressing - you must prevent them from following you from room to room, and you must be the first to find a key to escape your home before a monster is upon you. To do this, you can do a simple detection; when a ghoul appears, open your eyes wide and make a sound to communicate that you're not where a ghoul is (if you are, they'll run back to their designated location). Or you can use another ghoul that has a special ability, like the fly ghoul that you can catch and fly on your shoulder (or a turret gun ghoul that can shoot deadly darts). Horror House has three unique ghouls with their own properties, each with their own mechanics, and the level design favors exploration to figure out how you can escape each room. There are many different locations to explore, and all the rooms are creepy and dark, with different sounds and objects to find. But the real challenge comes from how the sounds and locations of rooms, enemies and objects shift and play depending on your actions. (Note: Due to moral licenses, themes, and graphic violence, the game is available on Steam, but please be aware that the game's full graphic and content may not be appropriate for children.)  If you are interested in Horror House or looking for info on our content, please contact us at info@the-spade-family.com. __ ===== LEVELS & PATCHING: If you are using the game in offline mode, the levels themselves are randomly generated. When you start the game, you will discover that the levels are different, as the game spawns rooms to present to you and randomly resets the scene until you reach the level break. You will also discover that the rooms change from time to time - some may have doors, others may not. Some will be abandoned, others will be crowded. If you want to get more levels, you can purchase additional levels from our Official Game Page. We have devised an easy way to handle
