To examine the effect of a helmet and padding system on head injury risk during a single motorcycle crash. High speed camera footage of a single motorcycle crash was processed to create three frames of video depicting injury risk with and without the helmet and the helmet alone. All images were exported to a bespoke software program for 3D modelling of head injuries. Due to high variability in pattern of injury, the software was used to quantify injury risk by comparing the helmeted frame to the helmetless. Traumatic brain injury was the most common injury for all three crash scenarios. Injury risk was approximately 14 times greater in the helmetless scenario compared to the helmeted. Helmet use provided protection from injury to the cervical spine and head. Cervical spine injury was the most common injury in the helmeted scenario and reduced in the helmetless. Helmets provide protection from injury in a single motorcycle crash. A helmet alone may be insufficient to provide protection to the cervical spine but provides almost complete protection to the head from injury. The First Men and the Emergence of the Amazons How did the Amazonian Warrior tribe that defeated so many tribes over the centuries get started? The earliest humans looked like us, with upright canines, large brows and heavy brow muscles, and post-pubescent males were noticeably adept at giving long, sustained and deep-throated grunts as a greeting. The grunts were not only welcome, but also a welcome distraction. When a male demonstrated the ability to produce such a greeting, it was a coveted trait. The males were aware of the war drums of their rivals as early as the end of the Ice Age, as well as the arrival of, perhaps, other hunter-gatherer groups. The Manly Art of Grunting The need to out-grunt a rival became paramount. For, among the human tribes, even a man who didn't have a son or have
