Prothrombin is a vitamin K-dependent plasma protein that occurs naturally in the blood as a zymogen prothrombin, which is converted into the active form, thrombin, in the presence of activator proteins, tissue factor and factor X. The biological activity of prothrombin is due to the proteolytic activity of its active form, thrombin. Thrombin is a proteolytic enzyme that catalyzes the conversion of fibrinogen to fibrin. Surgical procedures often require rapid hemostasis to minimize blood loss. Severe bleeding can occur during surgical procedures. The site of a wound is examined to identify and control the source of bleeding. Occasionally, in a patient with a coagulopathy, it is difficult to assess the bleeding site. Sponges are often used to stop the source of bleeding and promote clot formation. Conventionally, the source of bleeding is identified by direct visual observation of the patient. Traditionally, the source of bleeding is usually identified using visual, tactile, or auditory information. Commonly, the source of bleeding is then dealt with using direct pressure to control the source of bleeding or the application of an external heat source to the bleeding site. An external heat source can be applied by using a heating pad, warming tube, gel pack or a hydro-cauterization instrument. The application of heat or pressure at the bleeding site can cause burns to the patient. In addition, certain medical procedures are performed to control bleeding. Bone wax may be applied to a bleeding site, however, bone wax tends to cause a patient discomfort. 1cdb36666d
