The invention relates to a locking device for locking two components which are movable relative to one another, it being possible for a user to move the first component and the second component away from one another using an actuating element. Furthermore, the invention relates to a method of locking a component using a locking device of this type. Locking devices of this type are used to releasably lock together a first component, for example, in the form of a housing for a sensor or a safety device or another electrical or mechanical component, and a second component, for example, in the form of a body side or engine side component of a vehicle for example a cylinder head, a cylinder, a pump or another component, in order to fix and/or immobilize the second component relative to the first component. A locking device of this type serves to fix a component to a retaining element, for example, of a vehicle in order to release the second component from the first component if it is necessary to release the component. When a first component is locked, for example, to a second component, the user cannot remove the first component from the second component using an actuating element. In the context of the present invention, the actuating element is an actuating part of a locking device. Moreover, the user cannot move the first component and the second component away from one another. Locking devices of this type are known, for example, in the form of a frangible disk, a frangible lock or a frangible link which connects the second component and the first component with one another. When the frangible part of a locking device breaks, the two components can move away from one another, for example, for maintenance purposes. This is especially advantageous in cases where it is necessary to remove one or more components from an actuating element, for example, in order to repair or service the actuating element. The setting or breaking force of the locking device is to be selected such that the component or components to be released are not damaged when the frangible part of the locking device breaks. Locking devices of this type have proven extremely successful in the context of motor vehicles, for example, in the form of engine side components, for example, a cylinder head, the cylinder or the oil pump or other components. A locking device of this type is used in order to fix the engine side component relative to an actuating element which is coupled to an actuating piston and has a releasing element, wherein the fixing of the first component to the

Characterization of the chemical constituents of a fermented milk culture from a traditional Korean food. Korean fermented milk products are usually made from fresh cow's milk. However, the majority of people cannot afford to buy fresh milk. Previously, we reported the isolation of actinomycin D, a potentially useful compound, from the cultured broth of a traditional Korean food. This study was conducted to characterize the chemical constituents of the culture of the traditional Korean fermented milk. The fermented milk was pasteurized and filtered. The chemical components of the fermented milk were extracted by solid-phase extraction, and the fractions were analyzed by high-performance liquid chromatography (HPLC), including chromatofocusing, ion-exchange chromatography, and size-exclusion chromatography. The chemical components of the fermented milk were identified by HPLC-photodiode array detection (PDA) and HPLC-electrospray ionization mass spectrometry (HPLC-ESI-MS). Actinomycin D and 3-methyl-2-butanone-4-ol were identified by HPLC-PDA, and three novel 3-methyl-2-butanone-4-ol derivatives (compounds 1-3) were identified by HPLC-ESI-MS. These three compounds were isolated from this type of fermented milk for the first time. These results suggest that components obtained from such a traditional Korean food may be useful as new medicines. “Argentina is to go to the polls to pick a new president in December. The outcome of the poll will likely have major implications for IMF programs and monetary policy,” says the IMF’s lead economist for Argentina. “The next Argentine government could come into office with fiscal policy that is quite different to the government we see today, but one thing is for sure: the economic outlook would certainly be worse.” “Argentina’s economy is in a deep hole, made deep by currency devaluation in recent years and high fiscal deficits which have been supported by large macroeconomic stimulus programs,” says Preiserer. “Add to that the uncertain response from international markets to an Argentine administration that might seek to change the economic outlook and direction of the country.” “We expect the country to be under pressure for some years to come – unless the outcome of the presidential election takes a different direction,” he explains. “Argentina will be tested
