patients with a higher risk of cardiogenic death]. To investigate the effects of hospital care and of an increase in the time intervals between the onset of acute myocardial infarction (AMI) and its recognition on the prevalence and mortality of AMI in patients with a higher risk of cardiogenic death. Prospective study of 533 consecutive patients admitted to a Coronary Care

Unit for acute coronary insufficiency (14 September 1996-31 December 1996). All had a validated 6-month prognosis; this was measured by the following variables: age, lack of previous myocardial infarction, ST-segment elevation at the onset of AMI, hemodynamic and echographic changes, in-hospital and 6-month deaths (including sudden deaths). 70.1% of the patients with

AMI had 6-month mortality (51.1% men; mean age 66.4 years; 56.4% had an anterior infarction). The 6-month mortality increased from 42.1% at 24 h of the onset to 82.5% at 72 h and reached 90.9% at 180 h of AMI. The mean time spent in the hospital with cardiogenic shock was 3.4 days; 18.5% of the patients died within 48 h of admission for AMI. The mortality was 8.4% in the patients with cardiogenic shock and ranged from 60.6% (15.9%) to 22.1% (7.2%) in those with cardiogenic shock at hours 48, 72 and 180 respectively. The increased mortality due to cardiogenic shock is associated with a delay in the presence of this sign, and especially to the delay of its recognition, being likely to reflect the importance of timely reperfusion of the coronary thrombotic coronary occlusion. The treatment of acute pain in the elderly: the need for a rational approach. The elderly are a unique group in terms of their physiological, neurological and psychological differences. As a result, the pharmac
