It was announced in October 2011 and was first released as a prototype, followed by the final production version in July 2012. The A6 was not designed specifically for the iPhone 5, but rather is an upgrade to the iPhone 4S's A5 processor. The A5 became the main CPU for the iPhone 4S while the A6 was a minor upgrade for iPhone 5. The A5 was succeeded by the A5X. Design The A6 is a 7-nanometer processor, manufactured using a 45 nm process, that combines an array of eight processing cores with a dedicated graphics core. The A6 is the first Apple processor with a significant GPU core, being based on the next-generation graphics core, the Imagination Technologies PowerVR SGX 543MP2 GPU, which uses double the number of shader units (20) and introduce 32 texture units. The A6 has 80 movable macro-ops, 64 kFloat multiply-adds, 192 kFloat vector multiply-adds and 96 kByte floating-point image unit on the same die as the CPU and GPU. The logic used to run the machine code instructions in the design of the A6 includes a micro-architecture called High Performance Scalar Unit (HPSU), which utilizes a mix of dual-issue and single-issue concurrent execution to improve performance of some use cases of vector arithmetic. The design of the A6 incorporates a new instruction set architecture called VFP, which is a superset of ARM's NEON. VFP uses a large variety of multimedia instructions such as integer and floating point comparisons, floating point multiples, transcendental function implementations and floating point vector add operations which are designed to be more efficient when performed on floating point operations. The new HPSU architecture may reduce the 0cc13bf012
