VueScan 9.7.04 (x64 patch)There are eight candidates running to be a council member for the Downtown West Planning Commission, and some of them have seen more than their fair share of these kinds of challenges on the streets of Santa Monica. In addition to their popularity, the commission has one feature that sets it apart from other bodies: The public can vote in the election. With so few candidates running, it means that those who haven't always had a consistent voice in development debates can step into that role now. Fernando Matanky, a Santa Monica resident and director of sustainability initiatives at the non-profit California Center for Sustainable Communities, had a goal when he moved to West Santa Monica six years ago: He wanted to be a part of the neighborhood. "I just wanted to be a part of the community," he says. "It's my sense that there is a lot of great community spirit, and this is an opportunity to see that." Matanky and his friends began attending commission meetings and became increasingly interested in the issues that came up in public. In February 2018, he ran for commission and was elected. But when he came back from the military, he ended up getting divorced and didn't have a job, so he decided to go into real estate. "I started doing it for fun," he says. "And by the end of it, it became a real job." Matanky is now working on re-developing the property he has on the corner of Montana and Cloverfield Boulevards. That site, which was once part of the Santa Monica Polo Club, was acquired by a real-estate company in 2016, and Matanky first became aware of the concerns of the adjacent landowner, whose principal interest was increasing housing density. The homeowner, whose name has been removed from the property, had stated that he was concerned about increased traffic, parking, and the impact on his nearby community gardens. The
