The Android team has turned the source code over to its master devs, who are busily squashing the bugs and gathering bugs reports as they go. A shipping version is likely to be available in the coming weeks, with only those finalizing their builds to be a bit late. The Android team has said that the 10th anniversary update, codenamed "Jelly Bean," is going to be a significant one, not just because of its release, but also because it represents a turning point for Android—the point at which it was no longer just a small piece of software inside a phone, but rather a complete operating system unto itself. That's why Google is making the Android team take a public break, so that they can come up with something special. As far as what that public break means for all of us, a lot more will be revealed over the coming days. Android Central is going to be the first place you'll see Google's big anniversary product with the first hands-on videos and fresh information as it arrives. For a closer look at what the "Jelly Bean" update will do when it's released, we've got a series of feature videos for you to look at, some of which are showing off the new lock screen, new notification system, new audio controls, camera, and more. We've got a big recap of Jelly Bean coming up later today, but we'll be sure to post a link to that once it's up. Keep in mind, this is just the tip of the iceberg. As Android progresses, you'll also see new devices. HTC has said that we'll start seeing a new flagship "Hero" device in the next few weeks, and we're expecting a more affordable version from LG to arrive shortly after that. Iranian women protest against restrictions on women's clothing in response to a law that severely limits women's clothing in public in Isfahan, Iran, Monday, Feb. 19, 2017. A cleric says local authorities will be forced to enforce the country's tough new dress code once President Hassan Rouhani leaves
