How to Edit Images with Photoshop - the Easy Way To edit an image in Photoshop, select the area(s) where you want to make changes in the Layers panel. By default, the active document is the only active layer. All the other layers are inactive. To activate or select a layer, click on the layer in the Layers panel. Now you can move, duplicate, delete, or add other layers. To add a new layer, Click on Layer To duplicate an existing layer, select the layer and click the Duplicate Layer button at the top left. To delete a layer, select the layer and click the delete button on the right. To change the layer's color or lighting, use the blending modes. The Photoshop blending modes are a way of merging color, light, and dark areas of your image. Layers blend by transparency. As you begin, merge the layers, dragging one over the other. Blend mode is typically used for different effects. Usually, the more light you give the layer, the lighter the image. In other cases, more dark colors will give the image a deeper, more shadowed look. Here are a few blending modes to try: Pixelate To pixelate an image, make sure your Image Blending Type is set to Screen. Then, bring up the Magic Wand tool and click on the image. Once you have selected the area to be changed, drag the selection from the image to the Layers panel. Then go to the Window menu and select Blending Options, then click on the Linked button. Now you can drag the new layer as a copy of the original layer with the same transparency setting. You can increase the opacity with the grayed eyedropper tool when you drag the new layer. Here's a tutorial on how to create a pixelated photo in Photoshop. Screen Duplicate Delete Erase Blend Burn Overlay Luminosity Gradient Map Chrome Blend Darken Lighten Color Burn Color Dodge Colorize Multiply Screen Duplicate Delete Luminosity Color Dodge Selective Color Selective Color Bleach Hue/Saturation Convert to Grayscale

Technical Field The present disclosure relates to a four-level complementary metal oxide semiconductor (CMOS) image sensor, and more particularly, to a CMOS image sensor which can achieve a dramatic improvement in image quality. Discussion of the Related Art Generally, CMOS image sensors (CIS) are mass-produced based on the same technology, and each pixel has one n-channel metal oxide semiconductor (NMOS) diode and a photocurrent generated from a light. FIG. 1 is a diagram illustrating a conventional four-level complementary metal oxide semiconductor (CMOS) image sensor (CIS). Referring to FIG. 1, a unit pixel 11 includes a photodiode PD to convert incident light into electrons and a photosensor 12 to convert the electrons into electric signals. The photosensor 12 has four levels of voltage VDD, VPP, VNN and VSS. When the photosensor 12 is turned on due to the incident light, an electric charge is generated in proportion to the amount of light and then stored in the photodiode PD. An integrated circuit (IC) chip 13 performs a read operation with respect to the four-level photosensor 12 and then generates an image signal (Y). The CMOS image sensor (CIS) converts the image signal (Y) into a digital signal of three or four bits through analog-to-digital conversion to display images based on the digital signal. Referring to FIG. 1, in the case of a CMOS image sensor which has one light sensing region as a single unit, when a read operation is performed with respect to one single light sensing region, the entire circuit is operated in an abnormal condition. Accordingly, a defect in the CMOS image sensor has deteriorated effects on entire image quality. In particular, in the case of a CMOS image sensor, the amount of electric charges stored in the photodiode PD varies according to the amount of light incident onto a unit pixel. In other words, when the amount of light incident onto a unit pixel is more than a prescribed level, the amount of electric charges stored in the photodiode PD is larger, and thus, white out occurs at a bright portion. On the other hand, when the amount of light incident onto a unit pixel is smaller than a prescribed level, the amount of electric charges stored in the photodiode PD is smaller, and thus, black out occurs at a dark portion. As described above, in the CMOS image sensor,

Thinking about the intimate relations between the human mind and the body, and how such relations can be described in psychological or neuroscientific terms, I have struggled to distinguish between sensa, i.e., the inner and outer senses and their corresponding objects, and non-sensa, i.e., the mathematical, mechanistic, or computational knowledges of the brain and body. Recently, I have proposed to read only sensa. According to this reading, the inner sense is correlated to the visual, and the outer sense to the kinesthetic and olfactory. It was suggested to me that sensory images of different kinds, of varying abilities to change, and various in their ability to materialize in the form of thoughts, feelings, or actions, could be conceived as "genome-like information" (Griffiths et al., [B8]; Crutchfield, [B3]; Griffiths et al., [B12]). Here, I propose to call this kind of information not-sensa, and to evaluate it as effectively as a computer program. According to the reading above, non-sensa is available as a brain-like computer with capacity for discrimination, iteration, and learning (Griffiths et al., [B12]). It is only a brain-like computer because the human mind is one, and to remain one, it must transcend the mechanistic properties of the brain, and the same is true for the brain-like computer to which it is compared. The data are not organized in a matrix, as in a computer, but in a series of living, moving objects. The interactions between the objects are "mutual", and there is only one set, which is the universe, or world in which the objects are moving and changing. As proposed by the intuitive psychology of Reid ([B21]), the contents of the mind are all-or-none concepts, and the same is true for the contents of the world, i.e., the concepts of the objects of the universe. This is not a case of identity. The production of not-sensa is like the production of a piece of music. According to the Pythagorean ideal of "number" and "harmony" between the mind and the world, the mind cannot produce anything that is not part of a larger whole, because the smallest idea that is associated with anything is a whole. In music, this is the principle of composition. The mind
