Driver Who Hit Three Minnesota Yoga Teachers Won't Face Charges Authorities won't press charges against the driver who hit three yoga teachers in South Minneapolis over the weekend, though he is required to take a driving course and the car he was driving won't be made available for use by the public. After a weeklong investigation, North Hennepin District Attorney Mike Freeman determined the driver who hit the trio Monday outside Minneapolis' Center for Yoga and Meditation, as well as his late-model, gray 2009 Honda CR-V, was not at fault. Freeman declined to specify why he determined the driver was not at fault. An attorney for the yoga instructors, Rhonda Stoffregen, declined to discuss the case publicly. She said the driver, who is not identified by authorities, and the two men in his car are uncooperative with the insurance company handling the car. Stoffregen said the three yoga teachers are being taken out of harm's way while they recover from their injuries. She said they are trying to decide whether to file a civil suit against the driver. Authorities said the three yoga teachers were taking a class when they were hit by the vehicle driven by a 27-year-old man from the Minneapolis area. Stoffregen described the suspect as a "perfectly nice, respectful, loving man" with a "good heart." But she said the driver's vehicle had no license plates, which meant the vehicle couldn't be made available for the public. She said it's unclear why the vehicle did not have license plates. According to Stoffregen, an immediate lesson is for "all of us who teach yoga to really be aware of cars driving by." Stoffregen said it's the only time she's ever seen someone intentionally drive into a yoga class. Freeman said authorities haven't been able to determine the driver's intent, adding that the officers on the scene weren't able to clearly see the driver's face. According to Freeman, police have determined that the driver was not under the influence. Freeman said the driver had three prior traffic citations and has demonstrated a lack of good judgment. One yoga instructor suffered a broken arm, and two others suffered minor injuries. They were treated
