When we need to merge an old string into a new one, we manually search the old string from the start. We have heard of string and map which seems suitable, and I know there are ways to optimise the insertion of strings. Does anyone have a suggestion for the general data structure for merging strings? To be specific: The idea is to have a data structure which allows for efficient searching, inserting and updating of strings. I think a List is not the best choice because for each list element we need to look at the index of the first occurrence of the search term. A Map would only allow for single-element searches. A String[] would allow either or both single-element searches or bulk searches. A List would allow for both single and bulk search and editing of entries. A: From your description, I see no advantage over List for what you've described. So I recommend that. If you're concerned about efficiency, then you could add a binary heap. Using immutable strings will make this step really fast and efficient, though it's important to be careful about copy initialization (a single immutable string is immutable) - ensure that when you create new strings, you don't end up with equivalent strings. Q: Multiple Lang.letter to create multiple tabular outputs I am using pander to create multiple report from a list of files. The code works so far but I can't get rid of the first tabular-line-break. With the help of the answer to this question I have been able to use the ReadLines function within the pander function. d0c515b9f4

Live Suite 9.7.0 Full Version For Windows Mac XMspcr How To Download Ableton Live Suite 9.7.0Q: Combine two in-place operations If I have a map of Set of elements, and a function  $g :: (a \rightarrow a) \rightarrow [a] \rightarrow [a]$  how can I reverse this operation? (I tried to put this inside of foldl, but I've had no success.) A: You will probably end up using foldr, which can combine any two sequential operations: foldr (++) [] [1..] (++) gives the list [2,3,4,...] and (foldr f z [1,2,3,...]) will then fold over that list, giving the result [1,2,3..] If you really want to just reverse the input: foldr (\x -> x) [] (tail [1..] ) If the order of the sets and functions matter, the (++) to reverse, or (\x -> x) to reverse) can be reversed without losing the data, e.g: foldr (\x -> reverse x) [] (tail [1..] ) If your function is non-injective, it is problematic to reverse. If your input is a partial function, you could change it to be a bijective function, by using e.g. flip from Data.Function: use class Monad m => MapFunctor m where () :: m a -> (a -> m b) -> m b () :: Map k a -> (a -> Map k b) -> Map k b xs y = fmap f xs where f (x:xs) = (x -> f) y The () function is often used, but it is not in the base package.
