Novel molecular and cellular approaches for the treatment of lung cancer. The treatment of lung cancer has made little progress in the last 30 years and currently represents a major clinical and socio-economic problem. The mutational profile of lung cancer is well defined, with mutations in oncogenes and tumour-suppressor genes being the most common events. The development of several strategies to block these genetic abnormalities has been employed. In the present review, several novel approaches to target lung cancer will be discussed. These techniques include the use of antisense and other modalities to inhibit protein synthesis, as well as the identification of genes that regulate cancer cell proliferation and survival, and the use of mAbs to target tumour antigens. These strategies aim to increase the specificity of target-toxin delivery and to overcome mechanisms of resistance. Ultimately, the goal of these new approaches is the development of a paradigm in the treatment of lung cancer.
