Egyptian medical officials said the explosion occurred near a police station in the center of the capital. Police are still investigating what caused the bombing, authorities said. Among the dead were five policemen, the television said. Police said they fired five officers who had resigned after the officer who set off the bomb was fired. "The incident shows that police are determined to support the revolution and keep the people safe," ElBaradei, former head of the Egyptian opposition National Salvation Front, said in a statement. A police spokesman said he expects investigators to finish their probe within a week. After the January 25 uprising that overthrew the president, the army declared itself in control of the country, promising a swift transition to democracy. But there has been a spate of attacks on police stations and military installations, particularly in southern Egypt. In a speech to the nation yesterday, President Hosni Mubarak offered his clearest acknowledgment yet of the protest movement. He said he would form a national unity government. Police have clashed with protesters in at least a dozen cities in the south since the uprising began. Yesterday's bomb was detonated in the busiest area of the city on a public bus, and the target may have been a police vehicle, said Ahmed Hegazy, a doctor at Cairo's Al-Qahera hospital. The bomb was hidden inside a backpack near the back of the bus, Hegazy said. Witnesses at the site said they heard an explosion and then saw the bus engulfed in flames. "
