What's new:

: Can't-Catch-a-Wine-Bomber Fall Frolic We're so busy with work, school, internship and preparing for the upcoming holidays/new semester that we hardly have time for anything other than commitments made on the day we schedule and stick to. And the thing about commitments is that many of them are not as easy to break as one would like to have it so. In this case it's an impending holiday where visiting friends and family is heavily used to and cherished. On the weekend of Sept. 18-20, Augustin came home for the first time to visit his sister and her family. (Hopefully, he doesn't feel too badly for his parent's relationship with Steve "The Wonder Father" Kuntz to come this year. I know it's been two years now.) On the first day, he kept in contact and told us he was waiting on the plane to come through a scheduled stop in the desert. On the second day, he completely forgot we'd been calling to check in because he had to go to the dentist. And so it was when he came home a few days later that I went out of my way to encourage Grandma and Gramp to head to Arizona for the Feast - the Mexican holiday that falls right before Thanksgiving in the U.S. The day after they got back, I was working on my computer at the library when a stressed and panicked-looking Augustin bursts into the library, with me following. "That's all you understand," he spouts, inflating his chest in a way that's a combination of British drama and Glamour. "How many computers do you even see at the grocery store? We're like, whatever." He shakes his head with an pouty face that causes me to chuckle, and then I walk away not to stop him from going back to college - or being a student at this time of life, in any case. A few days later, Augustin brought us a gift which he proudly proclaimed was a former student of his who he was working with on barrista projects. Standing between me and Augustin, is a brunette in a black and white floral patterned dress, with Chihuahua and snub-nose cowboy boots and a black jacket holding a purse of green that reads World
