It’s the “in your face” of this era. It’s the wild-eyed, grabby, take-what-is-mine patriotism that we seem to have left behind. —Keegan Jones, National Affairs contributing editor, is the author of, “The Unexpected War:

The Fight to End World War II Before It Started” (Storyline) The destruction of the Nazi regime’s oil industry is a major victory for the Allies. But postwar Germany proved to be more of a battlefield than the Nazis anticipated: For all the planning, the planners assumed they could move the German economy from fuel extraction to fuel production while leaving other assets untouched. They were wrong. At Nuremberg, trial prosecutor Telford Taylor described the German Oil Plan as “a ludicrously romantic fantasy that believed in a peculiarly fascist vision of German pre-eminence, not based on reality but on the irrationality of Germans themselves.” The war transformed the most important part of the German economy: Its fuel industry. The Luftwaffe used fuel to its advantage early on, maintaining warplanes at the front and in the air, but its dependence on imported oil for refueling meant it couldn’t take advantage of the Allied invasion of Italy.

When the British commenced serious bombing, the Luftwaffe tried to fill its strategic stocks of oil, destroying tons of it in central Germany in one night. Meanwhile, the bulk of its industries depended on fuel for their operation. Soon, the Luftwaffe was flying four hours shorter, then six. In 1943, the Germans began a frantic search for oil, hoping to start refineries. One targeted Buna rubber, one discovered the synthetic oil plant at Wittenzier. The Luftwaffe even formed a “reliable supply department” to gather oil and crude from across the continent and ship it to key factories. Stalingrad was the turning point. It wasn’t so much the brilliance of the operation that changed
