people in my life and I'm not surprised. But I'm not surprised by anything any more. The consistency of shitty luck.
What life gives you, life takes away. If you're reading this, a little early, you've already seen me humbly admit to you and the world that it's my fault. And you know that I'm the kind of person who's gonna try and do whatever it takes to make things right, make it up to you, fix it. I know, because I've been doing that for the last 36 hours. So I'm here to say, "Okay. I'm going to make things right. If I f&@% up you, if I'm a douche and you can see right through me, then I want you to know, I f&% you right back. We'll each go our separate ways and that's that." I won't ever sell you out Libgen. SALE.Q: How to get the file name of a disk image created by dd using it? I have created a bootable disk image by using dd on the following command: dd if=/dev/zero of=./diskimage.img bs=1M seek=1 After that I used mkisofs to pack the disk image and make the.iso file. Now how can I get the name of the disk image file? A: you can get the name by using ls, ls -la ./diskimage.img When you hear the term "solar photovoltaics", you probably think of panels that generate electricity, right? But what about the billions of dollars of global investments that have been made in research and development in solar thermal technology? A solar thermal power plant (STPP) generates electricity by concentrating sunlight to heat up a working fluid (typically water). This heat is transferred to an electricity-producing turbine that drives an electric generator. The investments are being made in commercial STPPs for electricity generation, also known as thermal solar PV (TSPS) systems, and for heating water for space and process heating applications, also known as concentrated solar power (CSP). By the end of 2011, global solar thermal capacity had grown to 847 megawatts (MW), with about 60% being TSPS (figure 1). This is forecast to increase to 18,000 MW by 2040, with many of those systems projected to be of solar thermal CSP capacity. These systems are typically located in locations where there is regular solar irradiance, such as in the Middle East and North Africa, western and southern Europe, North Africa, North America, South Africa and Australia. Annual solar irradiation varies by continent, ranging from a high of about 550 kWh/m² per annum in southern Europe to a low of about 90 kWh/m² per annum in North Africa. These figures suggest that the growth in solar thermal systems is strongly linked to population. So, whilst the price of solar cells has been decreasing over the past couple of decades, the greater demand is pushing up the cost of solar thermal systems, despite their high capital cost. In the US, for
