Computer scientists are sometimes called the "cheaters" of the computer science club because they do it under the table. They break computer rules. When done properly, using a computer to do something that it was not originally designed to do is a fascinating and worthwhile activity. Doing it improperly, however, could have scary consequences. Many of today'

.Q: Check if a string is the result of urllib.urlretrieve in Python I am using Python 2.6 and I have a CSV file which I am reading using the following piece of code: import csv f=open('filename','r+') reader=csv.reader(f) The file has a list of email addresses of users, something like this: 1@gmail.com 2@gmail.com 3@gmail.com 4@gmail.com 5@gmail.com 6@gmail.com I use a loop to check all the addresses (the above file contains 10K users). This is my code (the check_file and check_single are functions I wrote myself): with open(check_file,'r+') as fh: for x in fh: if x.find('@')=-1: check_single(x) This is my function check_single: def check_single(email): url = " + email try: response = urllib.urlretrieve(url,email_out) f = open(email_out,'r') return True except IOError, e: return False I would like to know if it is possible to check if the email I got back from the function is the result of the function urllib.urlretrieve, so that I can avoid the large amount of emails I am checking. I assume it should look something like this: response = urllib.urlretrieve(url,email_out) if not is_totally_different_object(email_out,response): print 'This email address is valid' A: If you are looking for more of a hack then you should use this module. I'm not sure why you would want to use this instead of just checking the string that
