As I don't run Linux or have access to another machine to test it. So the one thing to do is probably just leave it as an HTML/static mess and forget about getting Unity working. Then live with a product with some broken GUI due to user error or bugs. I have joined the international effort to protect whales and dolphins from the effects of the devastating power of a slightly mutated virus called SARS, and which is now spreading from boat to boat through the ranks of seafaring humanity. But there is a related issue, which should concern us all if we want to live in a sustainable world. That issue is the use of smart bombs or weapons: "for the people," as they say, but where the people who use them and the people who suffer as a result are also

Overlay Studio was a producer of old-time radio and Big Band swing music for publication on Decca Records. Interspersed with this program were a variety of other programs relating to sports, women's issues, and culture. Overlay Studio was founded by Richard Carfagnini in Philadelphia in January 1937 as a radio program for the Armed Forces Radio Service (AFRS, an entity under the United States Department of War). Some of the first musical programming heard on AFRS was broadcast on evenings beginning January 10, 1937. In addition to having Jack Benny and others as guests during the dinner hour, it included Roland La Viña and his orchestra. Later in February of that year, Ellery Hunter hosted a series of "follies" for the radio actor/comedian. When AFRS ended in July of that year, its personnel were divested of his stake in Overlay Studio. Carfagnini then shifted his focus to the new program The Overlay, produced for the Big Band Swing & Rhythm Network. That program was continued after the AFRS shutdown of radio in March of the following year. By October 1938, Carfagnini again split from AFRS to become associated with the Hollywood network for the Pacific Broadcast & Supply Company. He resumed producing The Overlay on the latter network's behalf, and even organized a radio department for the network. Military Broadcasting Activity In June 1938, The Pacific Broadcast & Supply Company was awarded military broadcast rights by the United States Army. In September 1938, the company was granted permission to use the names of the Armed Forces Radio Service (AFRS), the Army School of Broadcasting (ASB), the United States Marine Corps Schools of Music (MC), and the Marine Corps Schools of Music (MCSM) as station call letters for new military stations. Carfagnini retained control of the Overlay Studio production, and all of the radio programming that was broadcast on network stations. Titled The Overlay, the Big Band Swing & Rhythm Network commenced operations on December 12, 1938, with a program that was split evenly between the standard talk shows and music. The Overlay was first heard on radio station WBR in Pawling, New York. The initial audience reaction to the network was positive, and the program continued on Tuesday through Saturday evenings until April 12, 1939. The Network was subsequently expanded to a full-fledged network of outlets., the stations can be found at the
