2.10.0.622 multilanguage Master 2016. In the process of completing this book, I have been delighted to find, as a result of research in my own library at home and in several libraries in the University of Vermont, that Jane Alexander has already been at work on this same issue. In one of her lectures at the University of Pennsylvania, she says: [P]erhaps we could propose a new definition of performativity; the notion of the text as a kind of artifact.... A text is not just a text; it is also an artifact, a product, a token, of some kind of discourse formation, execution, or interaction. We want a definition of text that lets us say something positive about what the text is in its world, as well as about what it says in its world, instead of simply about what it says. By artifact, I mean a product that is a finished artifact.... [T]he definition would be, the text is the product of some form of interaction, of at least a constellation of semiotic acts... (Alexander 6d1f23a050
