Chain reaction mania: relating entanglement to protein-protein association. Protein association is largely initiated by a high affinity-low binding strength interaction with a specific interaction partner. We make use of this fact to control the reaction mechanism, using a water soluble covalent linker designed to be cleaved off after protein-protein association. Both, binding to the interaction partner and chemical cleavage of the linker occur spontaneously. We can thus, for the first time, use a reversible reaction in a structural study of a protein-protein interaction. We demonstrate this with a synthetic model system of a recognition protein (scaffoldin), which is "linked" with its interaction partner (scaffoldin binding protein). Surprisingly, the nature of the linker has a profound effect on the mechanism of complex formation. Furthermore, we show that a sequential binding model, where the reaction is initiated from the interaction partner, does not explain the observed formation kinetics. On the contrary, we find strong evidence that the reaction proceeds along two parallel pathways, with formation of a large macromolecular assembly. This is due to the fact that only a fraction of the linker is cleaved off. We therefore emphasize the importance of thermodynamic equilibrium for efficient association. Henrikson v New York City Hous. Auth. (2017 NY Slip Op 07449) *Henrikson v New York City Hous.
