'Mahanavami' Amitabh Bachchan. In an interview with Microsoft's Bill Gates, Mark Zuckerberg complained about how there isn't anything you can buy in the App Store that isn't available through "Amazon, a taxi company, or a clothing company." Zuck then compares the Apple App Store to another magical product that changed the way the world works (the TV) and that you don't have to "stick your whole hand into the box" to get to experience the magic (TVs these days don't require a cable and a remote or even a cable box to function). When asked about Microsoft's return to gaming, Gates says it has been "super successful" and does not mention how he recently tried to buy a game off of the App Store for Windows Phone. And for good reason -- usually when we criticize things, we're talking about the ones that are actually made with an iPhone in mind. Plus, it's not really Microsoft's fault that the GameCenter feature doesn't go as far as it could to help us make a game for Windows Phone because the Xbox SDK just doesn't allow access to the social features of the system. For a start, if you want to just post to the "Everyone" part of Game Center, the API doesn't expose it to you, so if you want to turn on leaderboards or invites, you have to build it yourself. Why? Because for obvious reasons Microsoft couldn't give you access to the APIs that are used to make the stuff on the iPhone and iPad. See, that's the funny thing about these things: they're hard. We knew how hard it was going to be to make the games for the iPhone because Apple gives you the APIs and they didn't lock you into an SDK. They just expose them to you and you can build the stuff yourself as long as you're willing to learn the language (and the fact that they give you all the tools isn't just an afterthought either). Microsoft has a hard time with these things because they don't allow you to access the raw APIs, it's a small enough company that they have to build all of these things themselves, and, from what I hear, they're actually trying to build the
