Post-operative analgesia in a day-case laparoscopic sterilization. The market for low-cost, no-cost and free-of-charge hysterectomies is growing rapidly worldwide because the demand for female sterilization has increased, especially in developing countries. Laparoscopic sterilization is the most common method of sterilization performed in day-care centers. However, pain management in such settings requires continuous monitoring and appropriate drug therapy, as the minor injuries that occur during the procedure may be accompanied by disabling pain. This prospective, randomized, double-blind trial was performed to compare two post-operative analgesic protocols in a day-case laparoscopic sterilization and to assess the safety of the local anesthesia used for this procedure. Two groups were formed: in group 1, patients received 50 mg intramuscular (IM) butorphanol at 6 and 12 h after surgery. Group 2 received 50 mg intramuscular ketorolac at the same times. Pain intensity in the groups was assessed, using a visual analogue scale (VAS). Oral opioid consumption was measured between 24 and 72 h post-operatively. Of the total of 30 patients enrolled in the study, 23 completed the follow-up period of 14 days. The VAS pain scores and oral opioid consumption were significantly different in both groups. 6d1f23a050
