January 7, 2019 As JNU enters its third semester, students, faculty, and institution need to collectively fight what one former professor calls an "oppressive atmosphere." THE QUARTERLY WORD is a newsletter by and for the campus community. It is published every other week during the academic year. The Outlook To JNU's immediate left is the sprawling law faculty known as the Sharada Banarjee School of Law. Like the rest of the JNU campus, it is known for its left politics. It is where many students, including Dalit students, take their education. In a statement released on February 1, former professor of law Reem Mukhtiar discusses why she thinks the atmosphere in the Sharada Banarjee School of Law is oppressive and what she hopes the university administration can do about it. "I believe that the atmosphere in the school is oppressive and that there is a need for a radical transformation of the system," Mukhtiar says. "The road ahead is not easy. I do not expect that this would happen within a short time, but I believe it is necessary for [JNU] to start evaluating their governance structure, policies

The RNA polymerase II complex is recruited to each promoter through specific sequence recognition motifs. This process is highly regulated by a number of small proteins, termed transcription termination factors, which interact with the polymerase complex. These proteins are therefore critical for the transcriptional regulation of gene expression. One of the fascinating aspects of the transcriptional termination process is the wide variety of different termination signals generated by different transcripts in eukaryotes, which has led to the model that transcriptional termination is not a passive process, but rather is an active, regulated process. In addition, the transcriptional termination process is tightly coupled with the epigenetic regulation of the activity of specific genes and therefore plays an important role in establishing the appropriate patterns of gene expression. This review will focus on the regulation of the transcriptional termination process, the influence of termination on gene regulation and the role of the transcriptional termination factors in the epigenetic regulation of gene activity.
