Whether you like taking dogs on trail hikes, engaging them in flyball, or swimming in lakes with them, many dogs enjoy camping with their owners. However, camping also presents unique safety concerns for dogs. To ensure safety, you should ensure your dog is comfortable and healthy before you head to camp. If you plan on camping with your dog, it's a great way to bond, exercise, and become a better leader for your dog. However, you also need to prepare for the potential risks if you aren't careful about the rules and regulations for carrying a dog in your vehicle. Keep reading to learn the main concerns when camping with your dog in the back of your vehicle. Dog Leg Length & Size The first step in preparing to camp with your dog is ensuring your dog can fit in your vehicle. Dogs must not exceed 30 inches in length, or 16 inches when sitting up. The ideal height for a dog in the back of a vehicle is 8 to 14 inches. Be sure to check if the vehicle is configured to hold a dog using the rear door ramps, cargo area, or the dog cages in the back. While you may want to put your dog in the back of the vehicle in the interest of convenience, it can create another set of risks by not allowing them enough room to stretch their legs. You should also consider the size of the dog when adjusting the seats to accommodate them. Heat Build Up

1. Field of the Invention The invention concerns a method and a device for opening and closing the free end of an open-pore cardboard sheet with which the first blank is moved to be peeled off from the second blank. 2. Description of the Prior Art In known devices for opening and closing the free end of a blank with which the first blank is to be peeled off from the second blank, the free end of the first blank is closed at a clamping device using rotating cutting tools. With these known devices, the first blank, having a diameter smaller than that of the second blank, is clamped such that the marginal edge of the free end of the first blank remains loose over the surface of the second blank. The marginal edge of the free end of the first blank lies in the open free end of the second blank, so that it constitutes a reopening edge. This reopening edge is lifted by the cutting tools, which are usually made of a highly wear resistant material, and the first blank is peeled away from the second blank. For this purpose, the cutting tools and the open end of the second blank are disposed on a rotary table and each are guided into contact with the second blank. The rotary table is mounted on a common shaft which also carries the cutting tools and a second table on which the first blank to be peeled off from the second blank is held. To remove the first blank, the previously cut second blank is moved back slightly along the shaft so that the first blank is lifted off the second blank. Subsequently, the first blank and the second blank are moved in the opposite direction along the shaft until both are again in contact with one another so that the first blank is closed over the second blank. This makes it possible for the first blank to be opened to the extent to which it is to be used to form a folded cardboard sheet. In known devices, it is expedient to cut the second blank into a reopening edge in
