Crack Only-3DM. 7z.rzfm,[Mycosis of the gastrointestinal tract in dialysis patients. Apropos of a series of 70 patients]. Gastro-intestinal mycosis accounts for more than 30% of the infections in patients on haemodialysis and for 10% of the overall mortality in these patients. In this series, 70 patients out of 1435 on haemodialysis have been studied over one year. The patients received one or several courses of fluconazole prophylaxis or treatment of a gastrointestinal mycosis. The patients with positive swabs (n = 34) have been treated with itraconazole or fluconazole; the others have been given prophylactic treatment without any positive swab. There were 13 cases of fungal gastroenteritis, five cases of candidiasis, and 18 cases of oesophagitis, 10 of which were caused by Candida albicans. The mortality of the patients with mycoses was 63.2%; only 28.5% of them were prophylactically treated. A total of 6% of the episodes of candidiasis and 12% of those of oesophagitis occurred during fluconazole treatment. In 8% of the cases of gastro-intestinal mycosis, there was no etiologic diagnosis. A total of 18% of patients were given multiple mycoses. The series of 70 patients gives an average rate of 89 candidiasis and 2.6 fungal gastroenteritis per 1000 dialysis sessions. The non-specificity of the symptoms of gastro-intestinal mycoses complicates diagnosis. The treatment by fluconazole or itraconazole as a single treatment or in conjunction with a course of amphotericin B is effective and safe. There are two drugs which are superior to the others, i.e. fluconazole and itraconazole. The comparison of these two drugs has not been the subject of any study.
