The effects of gender on bipolar disorder: a structured literature review. Gender effects in bipolar disorder are not fully understood. This review was designed to summarize relevant research literature on gender differences in bipolar disorder that have been published since the previous review in this area and provide an integrated framework for future research. The last review of gender effects in bipolar disorder was published in 2008. This review is a structured and systematic literature review of the available evidence of gender differences in bipolar disorder. All sources were identified using Medline and PsychINFO databases in December 2012. This review is reported according to the Preferred Reporting Items for Systematic reviews and Meta-Analyses recommendations. Thirteen studies that reported on gender differences were included in this review. Study findings included that women were more likely to be depressed and less likely to be manic than men. At least some women also showed greater co-morbidity with major depression, eating disorders and obsessive compulsive disorder, compared with men. Studies focused on the effects of comorbidity on the outcomes of bipolar disorder also showed that the presence of c6a93da74d
