I have changed the title and description of this question. As to the rest of the question, I'll get to it this afternoon. I'm still going over a long list of questions this week with the goal of coming up with a schedule that makes sense. A: browsing in the latest issues of E&E, I noticed an article discussing your background on amphibians, mammals, and evolution in arid regions. If you'd like a little review, it's the second article starting on the first page of a major issue, and you can get it directly from the journal here, in pdf or the print form here. As for the review, I feel that it lends well to your question. Your hypothesis about speciation in mammals, et. al., was already mentioned here. As to your question in relation to it, my first thought is that it seems a bit on the "flash" side, but not much. One difficulty of course, is that the paper you cite is primarily concerned with the speciation of birds, rather than with other vertebrate groups. So it might be worth that you look at the papers you cite for individuals with species as those you cite.
