activation code otp uses the sabatier principle in the context of a reaction catalysed by a zeolite. this principle makes possible to use the same reaction for isolation of a stable precursor that can be transformed via a high-temperature activation to an active zeolite. this principle is illustrated by the preparation of a ga-modified h-form tumbra zeolite by two-step reaction procedure (sivan et al. 2004). in this study, we have demonstrated that reaction products of partial alkene hydrocracking can be efficiently activated by treating them with hydrogen under a methanol-containing atmosphere. this is in striking contrast with the traditional method in which hydrocracking products are activated by exposure to oxygen at elevated temperatures. the difference is illustrated by the increase of catalytic activity in methanol conversion of alkene in comparison with the oxygen activation procedure. the modified activation procedure has been applied for the activation of reaction products from a tungsten-modified zeolite. in this case, tungsten ions were introduced into the zeolite to modify the zeolite acidity. the modified zeolite is then used as a base catalyst for the alkene methanol conversion. the same procedure was also applied for the preparation of a gallium-modified h-form tumbra zeolite. the latter was prepared via the modification of a methanol-containing h-zeolite with $\text{ga}(\text{no}3)_3$ followed by hydrogen activation. the use of a methanol-containing atmosphere for the transformation of alkene hydrocracking products into active zeolite is of particular interest when dealing with post-demetalation catalysts containing gallium.
