

If the linga of the Vigha's hymn is that of Shiva, as I think it is, then it may be a symbol of the cosmic existence of Shiva, which, as Kramrisch points out, is at variance with the full esoteric teachings, which mentions only Shiva as the cosmic influence that gives rise to the universe. The Vigha's Shiva-vigha is always in the feminine gender, who is not at all described as such by the Vigha as an abstraction. I think this verse is an allegory on Shiva-Shakti as cosmic influence. Among them is Alinga, who is Adi-Shakti. Because it is Adi-Shakti, the strength of her (Shakti's) Linga (existence) is very great and is able to sustain the entire universe. Then Alinga after slaying Shankhya deva, Shiva and Shakti became one in the body of her fetus. Thus Shiva and Shakti, being one body, composed of the triad Linga-Shakti-Shiva, is Shiva-Shakti-Shiva. When the Linga dissolves, Shiva-Shakti-Shiva is born in the body of Deva-Vig, through the Shakti-Shakti, that is, through Alinga. The Supreme, the Divine, and the Swarupa are mentioned together, and the alinga is called the fifth, the greatest, of the Bhuva Linga, and is also called the main Linga, the last, the subtlest, and the best. According to the Linga Purana, the linga is the seat of the Brahman. The linga itself is an embodiment of the Lingam. Lingam is said to be at the root of other cosmic truths. It is also one of the most valuable and the most powerful tools for meditation. In the Linga Puranam the linga is described as being a means to worship Brahma. Shiva himself is merely the agent and the administrator. It is the power of the lingam which makes Shiva and Brahma most powerful. In the Linga Puranam, there is a belief that the lingam was created for worship purposes. It is called an object of worship and is the symbol of ultimate liberation. In the Linga Puranam, Shiva had three sons. They are known as Siva, Muruga and Ganesh. The Linga Puranam seems to indicate that they grew up and lived separately. It further states that when the lingam reaches a ripe age, it needed a place where the Linga itself can go to sleep for rest.

The Lingayat tradition, asserts Subramanian, "proclaimed that women were the equals of men. Furthermore, they [the Lingayats] did not accept the Brahmanical sanctity of the Vedas".[22] Stories of Shiva's linga are found in all the Puranas. Most of them speak of the linga itself but there is also the legend of where this linga came from. So, even though these Puranic texts have been associated with Lord Shiva, they are really associated with Lord Vishnu. In the Vishnu Purana, there are two accounts of how this linga was made. One version says that Lord Vishnu and Goddess Parvati are on a journey and Parvati is interested in the lingam of Shiva. She sees a rock of the same size and shape as the lingam and asks Lord Vishnu who states that the rock has been created by Shiva. Parvati asks him where the linga for Shiva is and he describes the making of it. She proceeds to get three separate articles of that form and place them in front of him. At first, he refuses to accept them but after she prays for him, he accepts them. He asks her to make a hole in one of the articles. She then makes the hole, places in various materials and returns with all the materials to look at the linga for the next chapter of his story. On the other hand, the second version of the story of how the linga was made is more elaborate. It is the story of how Prajapati, the Lord of all existence made the linga. In this story, Prajapati is a cattle herder and wants to see Shiva to worship him. Having gone to see Shiva, he has been given Shiva's linga by the sage Agastya. He wants to worship Shiva with the linga. Because he is a Brahmin, he has been instructed by his guru that he cannot do the actual worship itself. He sees a rock like the lingam and asks Agastya what it is. Agastya tells him that it is Shiva's lingam and that he should make a hole in it. Prajapati then proceeds to make a hole in the stone, puts in various materials and returns to look at the lingam. He is impressed and instructs his disciples to make a similar lingam for Lord Shiva. When it is done, Prajapati decides that it is too small for Shiva and orders his disciple to make a bigger lingam. 5ec8ef588b
