When performing a privilege elevation to SYSTEM on Windows 8 and 8.1, the LocalSystem account is the default "Primary ID" of Windows, which enables this account to have increased permissions when compared with an unprivileged account of the same username. A privilege escalation vulnerability exists when a LocalSystem or LocalService account has elevated privileges. Exabyte has code that can be exploited via remote code execution to compromise a victim's system. Users should ensure that they have a valid user account and that it is not LocalSystem or LocalService. Users should also ensure that Windows is configured to prevent the elevation of privileges to the LocalSystem account. The exploit works under both Windows 8.1 and Windows Server 2012 R2, but not Windows Server 2012. Microsoft released updates for Windows Server 2008 R2 and Windows 8 to address privilege escalation vulnerabilities in the LocalSystem account. A privilege escalation vulnerability exists when a LocalSystem or LocalService account has elevated privileges. The LocalSystem account, which is the default "Primary ID" of Windows, enables this account to have increased permissions when compared with an unprivileged account of the same username. A privileged elevation of LocalSystem account may enable the LocalSystem account to have the ability to take control of a Windows system. Get it now and save the bird!.
