as usual, raymarine has a hatful of marine gear, and the marine gps is the best of the bunch. it lets you download virtually unlimited information from noaa, including ecdis (electronic chart display and information system) charts. underwater data is available but underwater acoustics isnt supported. however, its primary purpose is to set a track and store it on a card. this is the first time weve seen this, and it works quite well. the fugawi marine 5 supports a number of different chart providers. in addition to navionics, you can download and load the following chart types: arctic navigation 81, 82. british marine 99, 99.1. fugawi marine 4, 4.1, and 5, 5. ilmius mvteg. in addition to the charts and data, marine data is used by marine enc, and therefore any chart with marine data is able to be loaded and used by marine enc. for example, vessel traffic services (vts) can typically be loaded from vesseltraffic.org. marine enc can connect to any of the online services listed above using the following formats: jdl. imo. idb. log. rdm. the software can be a bit fussy. if you have a chart blanked for some reason, youll need to close and re-open the database to clear it. when you load a chart, youll notice at the bottom of the window the configuration report. in this you can select where to display the chart, which is in default easy view. you can have multiple views, but a chooser is not available. if you want to zoom in to the detail level, youll have to click it in the chart. but that alone doesnt let you get at the detail level. the detail view lets you see the detail level. there is also the option to see a dasal-only overlay on the chart, and there are a number of them you can choose from. you can look up a location, turn location lights on and off and see the height of buoys, or markers, which are typically a little larger than dinghies. you can also see ships, right down to size and identify the types, such as barges, barges-tankers, tankers, ocean going vessels, a variety of tender ships like minesweepers and tugs and bulkers, cruise ships and cruise ships, etc. it may not be used for the navigator, but this does a good job of quickly accessing the detail level. 5ec8ef588b
