I've been wondering this for a while, and I can't find a good answer, or rather I'm not looking hard enough for a good answer. So the question is: What is the reason that some methods of interfaces are static, and some are not? A: It's because static methods are typically 'methods that operate on the class' and non-static are 'methods that operate on instances of the class'. With an instance, you typically have a reference to the object, so you can refer to it by name, and then invoke the method. A class may contain many instances, but you only need a single instance for the method to work. With a static method, you have no such reference - you have no information about the object that the method is invoked on, so you can't invoke it. A: Basically, a static method belongs to the class and an instance method belongs to the object. So an instance method belongs to an instance and a static method belongs to the class. When you pass an object to a static method, the method will have access to the object's properties. In an instance method, the this keyword refers to the object on which the method was invoked and thus can access any of the instance's properties. As for non-static methods, they could be instance methods or class methods. If they're class methods, they operate on the class itself and don't have access to any instance. A: Static methods are instance methods. You can't invoke them without an instance of the class. class SomeClass { public void SomeMethod() { } } SomeClass sc = new SomeClass(); sc.SomeMethod(); I don't know why people call these "static", because a static method is one that can be invoked without an instance of a class. Edit: I'm not even sure how to
