I am running a client that updates the environment variables for my dotnet framework. I have provided them with the path, and they have it set correctly. I ran into a situation recently where I forgot to reinstall the dotnet framework. I was given the path to the.net framework and was able to load the application. In my.csproj file, I had a reference to the.net framework using a relative path: Now, the client wants to update this path in my.csproj file. So my question is, is it considered a security risk for them to know the path to my dotnet framework? A: I would say it is probably a better practice to leave the path as the default, but if you don't want to, this isn't a problem. In a nutshell, if your dotnet framework is bundled with your application and not a stand-alone product, you probably shouldn't include the path to the framework in your.csproj file. Otherwise, if you do include it, an attacker could easily look at your.csproj file to see the location of your framework and that could be a vulnerability. It's a risk, but it's a low risk.
