45, 60, 847 P.2d 791, 800 (1992) (quoting LaPlante v. State, 112 Idaho 718, 721, 735 P.2d 860, 863 (Ct.App.1987)). In addition, the record must demonstrate that the defendant's ability to participate meaningfully in the criminal proceedings was impaired. Id. The transcript of the sentencing hearing indicates that, at the time the sentence was imposed, both counsel for Barraza-Salas and the district court were in agreement that Barraza-Salas was not suffering from a psychological disability that would make him a danger to society. While Barraza-Salas argues on appeal that he suffers from a mental illness of undetermined etiology, he made no such claim to the district court or at the sentencing hearing. As such, we conclude that the district court did not err in rejecting Barraza-Salas's claims of mental disability. In sum, the district court did not err in concluding that Barraza-Salas was not entitled to an additional sentence reduction for the small amount of time between the date he was sentenced and the date the governor signed the pardon. While we recognize the hardships the execution of Barraza-Salas's sentence may cause his wife, family, and other relatives, we do not have
