Windows users can install various applications on their computer. While searching for a specific application, they can find hundreds of programs to download. Each program has its own advantages as well as disadvantages. For example, an antivirus program can quickly scan your computer and will flag any problem. You can watch the progress of the scan and will also have a list of problems being found. However, you will not be able to see what a program is doing on your computer. If you view the source code of a program you downloaded, you can see how it functions. However, you will not be able to use the program if you cannot read the source code.

The pride and joy of the digital world is now the iMac Air ! It's a full-featured and capable computer for only $999. That's $300 less than the last generation's white iMac , which was the most expensive computer available at that time. The new 11" model has a lot going for it. It's incredibly thin making it a great choice for someone who isn't using it as a full-time workstation. It also runs with Apple's new Ivy Bridge microarchitecture which delivers improved graphics performance along with increased productivity with both the keyboard and the touchpad. I wonder does anyone use the fx plug-in. Now I know the fx plug-in lets you make some fairly basic adjustments to images. The more I see of it, the more I see the app as mainly a way to change the photo to a better image. Forget just about any adjustment, grayscale, color modes, etc. The important things are, what background and what type of image is it, what is the best image to replace that background, how many people are in the photo, what is my reputation, is this a vacation photo or a birthday photo, etc. Yet the fx plug-in seems to be for just that. Dont use it for just anything. That's a real let down. What is Adobe thinking, do they expect the users to just use the app for completing their tasks and not use it at all? I don't understand. I wasted $80+ for this one time purchase. Thanks for your honesty and straightforwardness… being in the position that I am, I understand what you are going through… being an AP Guy and Photographers… it's so refreshing to have honesty and straight points to a very difficult situation. Thanks!
